Commentary

International Journal of Clinical Rheumatology

Rheumatologists Advance Genetic Research Related to Disabling Form of Arthritis

Chung-Yi Chen*

School of Medical and Health Sciences, Fooyin University, Taiwan

Author for Correspondence:

xx377@fy.edu.tw

Received: 03-Aug-2022, Manuscript No. IJCR-22-134; Editor assigned: 04-Aug-2022, PreQC No. IJCR-22-134(PQ); Reviewed: 18-Aug-2022, QC No. IJCR-22-134; Revised: 23-Aug-2022, Manuscript No. IJCR-22-134(R); Published: 29-Aug-2022; DOI: 10.37532/1758-4272.2022.17(8).134-135

Description

Scientists have discovered two new genes that are implicated in ankylosing spondylitis (AS), an inflammatory and potentially disabling disease. In addition, they pinpointed two areas along stretches of DNA that play an important role in regulating gene activity associated with the arthritic condition [1].

Work done in part by researchers at The University of Texas Health Science Center at Houston has led to the discovery of two new genes that are implicated in ankylosing spondylitis (AS), an inflammatory and potentially disabling disease. In addition, the international research team pinpointed two areas along stretches of DNA that play an important role in regulating gene activity associated with the arthritic condition.

The findings, a critical milestone in the understanding of AS, are published, a journal that emphasizes research on the genetic basis for common and complex diseases. This helps us better understand what is driving this disease and gives us direction for new treatments and diagnostic tests [2].

Based on work from a genome-wide association scan, the team identified genes ANTXR2 and IL1R2 as well as two gene deserts, segments of DNA between genes on chromosomes 2 and 21 that are associated with ankylosing spondylitis. Importantly, the study also confirmed the Triple "A" Australo-Anglo-American Spondylitis Consortium's previously reported associations of genes IL23R and ERAP1, formerly known as ARTS1.

Reveille, chief of rheumatology at Memorial Hermann-Texas Medical Center, said the genetic discoveries bring the scientific community closer to fully understanding AS, a chronic form of arthritis that attacks the spine and also can target other joints and organs in the body [3]. The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention for the National Arthritis Data Workgroup estimates that AS and its related diseases affect as many as 2.4 million people in the United States. It generally strikes patients in their teens, 20s or 30s and can cause a complete fusion of the spine, leaving patients unable to straighten and bend.

When I first started experiencing lower back pain and the aching joints, no one could tell me what was wrong [4]. It's fascinating to see how far we've come and how much has been learned about the disease.

These new breakthroughs are, indeed, good news for those whom we serve [5]. It is very encouraging to know that the health impact and economic consequences of spondyloarthritis in the world eventually will be contained as a direct consequence of the dedication, and that of the many individuals affected by spondyloarthritis who have participated in these studies.

Acknowledgement

None

Conflict of Interest

There is no conflict of interest.

References

1. Gupta S, Hawker GA, Laporte A et al. The economic burden of disabling hip and knee osteoarthritis (OA) from the perspective of individuals living with this condition. Rheumatol. 44(12), 1531-1537 (2005).
2. Nigrovic PA, Colbert RA, Holers VM et al. Biological classification of childhood arthritis: roadmap to a molecular nomenclature. Nat Rev Rheumatol. 17(5), 257-269 (2021).
3. Wollheim F. Classification of systemic sclerosis. Visions and reality. Rheumatol. 44(10), 1212-1216 (2005).
4. Skeoch S, Bruce IN. Atherosclerosis in rheumatoid arthritis: is it all about inflammation?. Nat Rev Rheumatol. 11(7), 390-400 (2015).
5. Colbert RA. Classification of juvenile spondyloarthritis: Enthesitis-related arthritis and beyond. Nat Rev Rheumatol. 6(8), 477-485 (2010).